

EN 4/6999
The End of African American Literature?
Summer Session II - 2015

Dr. Donald M. Shaffer
Lee Hall 2311
ds649@msstate.edu

(Michael Morgenstern)

COURSE DESCRIPTION

This course will examine the recent debate sparked by my former dissertation adviser Kenneth Warren that African American literature no longer exists, having only been made possible by a bygone period in American history marked by racial segregation. According to Warren, the overwhelming impetus behind African American literature and its authors was to make the case for Black humanity and for a more racially inclusive society. While many (if not most) of the authors of African American literature were engaged in such a racial and political project, it is also true that African American culture informed, shaped and ultimately maintained a tradition of “black arts” that continues in various forms today. We will explore the productive critical tension between Warren’s view of black literature as tendentious writing and a more expansive view that argues for the formal complexity (and universality) of African American aesthetics. In addition to Warren's book What Was African American Literature we will read canonical works in the tradition that fall within Warren's definition of "black literature," as well as more recent works by both black and white authors that presumably do not "count as" black literature.

Readings

Kenneth Warren, What Was African American Literature; Charles W. Chesnutt. The Marrow of Tradition; Jean Toomer. Cane; Richard Wright, Black Boy; Toni Morrison, Song of Solomon; [Course Packet] Consisting of readings from the works of William Dean Howells; Irving Howe; Frances E.W. Harper; Zora Neal Hurston; Norman Mailer; James Baldwin; Ralph Ellison and others